Periodontal inflammatory disease is a chronic infection of the periodontal tissues, which are located between the teeth and the gums. It is caused by bacterial plaque and occurs in two main forms: gingivitis and periodontitis. Gingivitis is an initial stage characterized by inflammation and redness of the gums, often reversible with proper oral hygiene. Periodontitis, on the other hand, is a more severe form that progresses deeper into the periodontal tissues, affecting the bone and other supporting structures of the teeth. This can lead to tooth loss if left untreated. The diagnosis of periodontal disease typically involves a combination of clinical examination, radiographic imaging, and microbiological analysis of samples from the infected sites. Treatment options range from professional scaling and root planning to surgical interventions, and may include antibiotics, in some cases.
